Roadside America. It also adorns the outside of Neil Zurcher's book "Ohio Oddities".

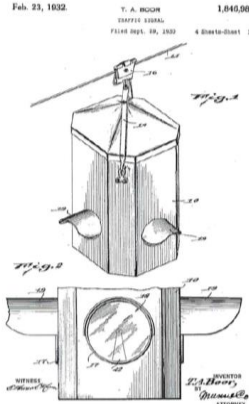

This is an internal schematic of the electric system for the original signal that hung at the corner of Long and Main Streets.

Boor's Original Light at Long and Main

Historian Dr. John Purcell has called it a state treasure and a priceless work of art. Award-winning playwright, Brian Burgess Clark, wrote "The Scioto Company" using it as a symbol of Ohio's pioneer spirit. Boy scouts in cities across the state have carried replicas in local parades. It has appeared as a centerpiece of the Sons of the American Revolution display at Ohio's bicentennial celebration. It has been accepted by Ohio's General Assembly as a symbol of Ohio's early statehood. Now it has been loaned to the Ohio Historical Society.

This is the outer appearance of the original light.

Boor is also credited with patents for hose clamps and a cornering plow. We are also lucky to have a silent movie that features his cornshocking device. Both Boor and another prominent Ashville inventor, Audrey Graham appeared in this epic that pitted embattled farm hands against Boor's interesting project.

Traffic light after its recent refurbishing By Max Marion—Looks almost as good as new.

This 1837 political cartoon appeared in the New York Times. Note the flag has seven white stripes and six red stripes.

Another important artifact is a crushed metal buoy from the U.S.S. Maine. The destruction of the Maine was the incident that sparked the Spanish-American War. The buoy in the collection still is encrusted with coral from the harbor in Havana, Cuba.
